Arts & Humanities

Poem: "Song"

By Joan Naviyuk Kane '06SOA

Winter 2013-14

I.

I made a song in thirds and two remain, ravined, while seasonally the gully swells with sound. On the slopes we twine grass, plait it thickly, its odor in the sun dissolves with the salt of the sea, forever rising.

II. He makes a song while winds strew pebbles aloft & carry clouds away.

Across a rock slide his trail scales steep towards three tiers of willow leaves & lichen barren of caribou gone to graze for all food.

III.

It is said that far beyond Imuruk Basin huge birds hunt whales on the open ocean.

Once shoved downslope by downbeat gusts a man alone fell to one knee, erred, aimed & pierced such a bird between its breast & the narrow column of its neck. Careening first up into the air & then a swaying slip into the valley below

it's come to rest beyond the subterranean terminus of a rivulet sourced from snow on now.

— Joan Naviyuk Kane '06SOA

Joan Kane's collection Hyperboreal won the Donald Hall Prize for Poetry. Her first book, The Cormorant Hunter's Wife, received a 2009 Whiting Writers' Award. Kane '06SOA lives in Anchorage, Alaska, and as 2014 Indigenous Writer-in-Residence at the School for Advanced Research is working on an autobiographical novel, Held.

Guide to school abbreviations All categories >

