ISERP Launches Center for Pandemic Research

Fall 2020

Columbia’s Institute for Social and Economic Research and Policy (ISERP), directed by historian Matthew Connelly ’90CC and sociologist Thomas DiPrete ’78GSAS, has launched a new Center for Pandemic Research to support a wide range of scholarly investigations into the social, economic, and cultural ramifications of the COVID-19 crisis, with applications to future pandemics.

“A lot of the most important problems arising out of the pandemic demand social-science research into such topics as how people process public-health information and why the virus is having very different impacts on different communities,” says
Connelly. “We created this center to support the most important and innovative new research.”

A few of the Columbia projects now receiving support from the center include interdisciplinary studies of anti-Chinese sentiment on social media, the pandemic’s impact on the lives of service-sector workers, and the challenges faced by journalists in accessing reliable information about the crisis.

A key focus of the new center, Connelly says, is supporting undergraduate and graduate research through seed grants.

All categories  >